The advertisements offered good wages those who would become managers the advertiser. Replies were to be for the advertiser. Replies were to be addressed to the advertiser in this city. The letter from Newark inclosed a pocket dictionary which "Sherman" sent as a sample of the goods he wanted his agents to sell. Detective Fox by tracing the man's mall, found Coutant located at the Commercial house in Water street near Fairfield avenue. With the man Detective Fox found papers which disclosed his system of working, Coutant, who signed "Sherman" to his advertisements, wanted managers for branch offices, and promised to send branch offices, and promised to send full information on the receipt of a full information on the receipt of a two cent stamp. He received large numbers of letters in reply to his advertisement and each enclosed a two-cent stamp. No copies of a dictionary were found in Coutant's possession when arrested and he denies that he over sent the book sent here by the Newark chief of police. Detective Fox sooked over Coutant's books and found that he kept an accurate account of all the letters he received and the amounts for every day. A part of his system was entered by initials, and these have not been explained to the police. From the books it is estimated that he received anywhere from 50 to 100 replies a day from his from 50 to 100 replies a day from his advertisements.
